This paper presents an analytic framework for "literacy" from a sociocultural perspective and uses participation in an online social networking site as an exemplary case of a particular digital literacy. It builds on a conception of social practice in which the technology aspect is fully present and visible.

Colin Lankshear is a freelance educational researcher and writer based in Mexico. He is currently Professor of Literacy and New Technologies at James Cook University in Cairns, Australia, Adjunct Professor of Education at Central Queensland University (Australia) and Mount St Vincent University (Nova Scotia), and a Visiting Scholar at McGill University in Montreal, Canada. His current research and publishing focus mainly on literacy and other social practices involving new technologies.
